Google is more than a search engine and is getting into mobile-only Android apps. But for now, let's go back to the Google for Android beta, which will be renamed to just Android. There is some speculation that it will be like the Chrome OS. You download it and there is no need for a PC. You can also download Google for Android using a PC. The OS will feel familiar to anyone who has used Android. As Android creates a new platform, you will have to create apps for it. So first, you need to decide what Android device or devices you want to support. Users will be able to download apps and run them in the browser, not unlike Chrome OS, as opposed to finding apps on Google Play. The browser is called Google Cast. You will be able to cast video, presentations, music, apps and more to compatible TVs, speakers and phones from different manufacturers. I found that I can use: @Pointcut("execution(* (..) && (@annotation(Test))") to select the points at which I will add attributes, and then I can use @Around("@annotation(Test)") to add attributes. But I need an access to an attribute of the object. Something like: @Pointcut("execution( (..) && (@annotation(Test).getAttr(myAttribute))") What can I use in place of getAttr? Thank you A: You can use this custom annotation @Attr: @Retention(RetentionPolicy.RUNTIME) @Target(ElementType.FIELD) public @interface Attr { String name(); } You can annotate your class or method, you can access the annotation and get the value: @Pointcut("execution( *(..) && (@annotation(Attr).name() =='myAttribute')") and your advice will be:
