The porting of Photoshop was a lot of work for the web developers at Adobe. There has been a lot of work by the web team, and amongst other teams, to ensure that we deliver a high performance application and a highly reliable application in the browser. The methodologies we created are now available in web dev tools like Chrome Dev Tools and Live Edit. While I'm sure this will evolve over time, right now we can learn a lot from the performance and reliability our customers have experienced. We can now share those tidbits with web developers to help even more. With the WebAssembly port of Photoshop, we're demonstrating the web as a platform for far more than the application of muscle memory. It represents an evolution in cross-platform application development. When we created the Mobile apps for the web and PC desktop applications for the web, we set out to enable software developers to write code once, release once, and have it work on any device. The WebAssembly porting of Photoshop shows that this is possible on just one platform, and is also accessible to web developers — so it may provide a glimpse of what the future looks like. Long live the web. The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. This is a lot of work for us and, to be clear, there are still some known issues that are being resolved to be able to deliver this. 933d7f57e6
